The recorded history of Russian theater starts in 1622, but it was during the reign of Peter the Great (1682-1725) that the theatre, like so many other Western (1) _____, first entered Russian life.

Though the first (2) _____ companies in the country were foreign, it was not long before native performers emerged. The theater became so popular among the upper classes of Russia, that many landowners began to set up theaters in their own estates, using their serfs as actors. The serf theater, which reached its climax in the first half of the 19th century, became the major feature of Russian (3) _____ life and produced a number of distinguished actors and actresses. Some of them later gained their freedom and became stars of the Petersburg stage.

At first all the plays produced in Russia were foreign, but the country was not slow to produce its own dramatists: A. Sumarokov, D. Donvizin, A. Griboedov, A. Pushkin, M. Lermontov, A. Gogol, A. Ostrovsky, and many others. Their plays depicted and satirized contemporary life of different social classes. The
