Laura Ingalls Wilder, the author of "Little House on the Prairie", based her classic novels on her own experiences growing up in a pioneer family. Life on the frontier was often harsh, but with each hardship, Laura grew stronger and took on more responsibilities. From insect invasions to raging blizzards, there was nothing this tiny trailblazer couldn't handle.

Laura's father, Charles Ingalls, had the heart of a pioneer. He never stayed in a place for long. He needed elbow room and quickly grew tired of an area as it became more crowded. Laura's mother, Caroline, preferred to stay settled in one place, but she reluctantly went along with her husband's wish to be constantly on the move.

By the time she turned seven, Laura Ingalls had moved three times. In fact, one of her earliest memories is of her parents packing all their belongings into a covered wagon for the trip from Wisconsin to Kansas.

After they arrived in Kansas, Laura helped her father build a house out of logs. One day, she saw Indians on the trail that ran past her house. That night she heard the sound of tom-toms in the distance.

The Ingalls did not know yet, but they had built their new home on land that belonged to the Osage tribe. When they had arrived, the Osage were away on a hunting trip. But now they were back and surprised to find white settlers living on their territory. After being told of their mistake, the Ingalls family agreed to leave. Once again, they loaded up the wagon and returned to the Big Woods of Wisconsin, where they lived for the next four years.

As more and more people began to move into the area, however, Laura's father started feeling restless again. He grew increasingly irritated at the sound of new settlers chopping down trees all around him.

Pa's dream was to live on a sprawling farm where neighbors were scarce and wild animals could run free. He heard about a town in Minnesota where there was plenty of room to roam.

After he had saved enough money, Pa bought a one-room dugout house in the town of Walnut Grove, Minnesota. The place was tiny, about the size of the wagon the family had just unloaded, but it sat on a parcel of farmland where he hoped to raise acres of wheat to sell to the big flour mills in the city of St. Paul.

In the fall, Laura and Mary started school. Laura was barely five years old, but the two-mile walk to the schoolhouse with her sister every morning was her favorite part of the day - even if they had to walk barefoot because their parents could not afford shoes for them.

The Minnesota winters were harsh, but the heavy snows provided the moisture that would make Pa's wheat crop grow. It was in the summertime that the family's problems began.

One day, just before the harvest, Laura was working in the field when a strange cloud darkened the sky. But this was no rain cloud – it was a swarm of locusts. One of the insects peeled out of the cloud and dove, striking Laura square in the back of the head. Then the others followed.

When the locusts finally moved on, the wheat field had been stripped clean. Her father lost his entire harvest. Meanwhile, Laura and Mary could no longer walk to school because the ground was blanketed with squashed bugs. Their mother taught them at home instead.

The next summer, Laura's father intended to try again with another wheat crop. But he didn't realize that the locusts from the previous year had laid eggs before they left. When they hatched, the bugs started feeding again. Once again, the farmland was decimated. This second invasion convinced Pa that wheat farming was not for him. It was time to load up the wagon again.
